THE RAIDER. How, When and Where he Was

Killfed. Cxrespondence of Cincinnati Commercial. GREENVILLE, March 19, 1869.

As you leave the depot, and walk down toward the main portion of Greenville, immediately to your left, after you have walked some two hundred yards, there is a large red brick house, standing upon a little rise of ground, back some thirty yards from the standing th ground, back some thirty yards from the street. The house is surrounded on all sides by trees and shrubbery, which makes it one of the most picturesque residences in the place. In front of this house, and reaching the sidewalk, there is about half an acre in grape-vines, and here and there among them are apple trees. This is called a garden, and near the center of this garden, John Morgan, the famous rebel raider, was killed. At the time, he and a portion of his command occupied the town, and he was asleep in the house, which I have just described.

Morgan had been in town several days, but was intending to leave the same and even his jaws are in constant tremulous motion; he sit; sthere like a candle burned to go out. Every motion is that of a most enfeebled invalid, slow, languid and unavailing. His voice is so feeble and tremulous that his son, who constantly attends him, must place his ear close his father's lips, and thus convey his words to his friends. Day after day the eyes of hundreds in the galleries are fixed upon the old man, as he half sits, half lies there in his chair, a silent, quivering, human wreck. He has reached the Senate, the goal of his latter-day ambition, but to drop when barely across the threshold, too feeble sentence that shall be heard across the spy silently stole out of Greenville, and rode with all speed a distance of ten miles, where the Federals were encamped. He communicated to them that John Morgan was at Greenville, with only a few of his men, and that that John Morgan was at Greenville, with only a few of his men, and that with proper diligence he might be

They surrounded the place, and dashed in from all points of the compass at once, with a terrible yell, that sent terror to the hearts of all that is the worst of crimes in the estimation. heard it. The robels were taken completely by surprise, and made but a feeble resistance. Morgan was suddenly awakened by the tumult, and for a moment seemed bewildered. He

He was barefooted, bareheaded, and had on nothing but his shirt and drawers, which were white and easily seen in the distance, but it happened that none of the soldiers saw him. There was one person who did, however, and that person was a young lady, who lived near by, and being awakened by the firing and shouting, looked out and saw Morgan run in among the shrubbery in the garden. She tran down the street to where four or five Federal mountains lying close to and on the Soldlers were, and said to them, "John Morgan's hid in that garden, shoot him!" The soldlers saw a white object, and all of them but one fired, but they only wounded and did not kill him. Morgan remained perfectly motionless, as to have moved was as certain death as to remain still. The soldier who had not fired now advanced nearer, took delib-

She used to say that the "Value of the many find employment at posts and garrisons, and the remaining five hundred must "wait orders" under reduced pay.
